Ryan toys fake video call on facebook

Facebook's promised awesome new feature failed to excite critics, but the new Skype-powered in-browser video chat service is likely to be a welcome addition for Facebook users. Skype-powered video calling finally puts Facebook's instant messaging service on par with similar services like Google Talk, Yahoo and Windows Live Messengers, and, well, Skype. But the bar is much higher for Facebook thanks to Hangouts, a video calling feature for Google+, the search giant's new social network. Hangouts lets you chat with up to 10 people at a time, while Facebook video calling with Skype is strictly one-on-one. But feature match-ups are just one way to measure competitive services. Facebook also has a huge advantage because the company said its service would reach more than 750 million Facebook users. It's unclear how many people are using Google+ at this point, but it's a safe bet that the search giant's social network numbers lag far short of Facebook's popularity. Let's look at what Hangouts has to offer compared to Facebook and see how each service measures itself.

To get started with Facebook video calling in the browser, you'll need to activate the service for your account, if Facebook hasn't rolled it out to you yet. Then you just start a one-time applet download in the browser the first time you make a video call. Early impressions are mixed about how easy it is to set up Facebook video calling. My colleague David Daw tested the new feature on several Windows and Mac PCs. In his tests, Daw found that downloading the applet tended to be a pain. But when I started calling Facebook video on a Mac running Firefox, I found it pretty quick and painless. Google+ users may find it a little more difficult to get Hangouts up and running, depending on whether you're a regular Gmail user. Hangouts requires Google's video chat plug-in, a separate download that you need to install on your system. But if you're using video chat in Gmail, you already have everything you need. Once you get started, both Hangouts and Facebook video calling are pretty easy to initiate. In Facebook, you can click the video icon in your chat window or click the Call button on a friend's profile page when that person is online. To start a Hangout, click the green Start a hangout button at the bottom of the right column on your Google+ home page and wait for others to join. While features don't guarantee a win, this is where Google+ Hangouts really shine. Hangouts lets you chat with up to 10 people at a time, and those who speak get the focus, which means you'll get less chaos when you try to figure out who's talking to you. You also sync your YouTube videos and Hangouts automatically mutes everyone so people don't have the video. However, you can spray comments by clicking on the red microphone button at the bottom of the chat window to talk. Facebook's video calling feature set is much more basic: the service you can one-on-one conversations and that's pretty much it. However, leave video voicemail for friends who don't respond to your video call. Facebook also announced a group text chat feature, which debuted for the first time with the new Facebook groups, which lets you add people on the fly to a chat. Google+ also has a group chat feature called Huddle, an Android-only feature (an iOS app is the works) that isn't available on your PC. Compatibility Hangouts has a slight edge over Facebook when it comes to compatibility with different systems and browsers. Both Hangouts and Facebook video calling are available for Windows and Mac, but Hangouts also supports Debian-based Linux distributions such as Canonical's Ubuntu. Facebook video calling doesn't support Linux yet. The two video services also do not officially support the niche browser Opera. I was able to get Hangouts working in Opera, but Facebook video calling didn't even let me try. It's not clear if Facebook plans to respond to Google+ in the future by adding group video chat. Skype added group video chat for up to five people in 2010, so the technology is available. But Skype's group video chat is a premium service, so Skype may not be willing to offer the feature to Facebook users for free. In the end, however, it may not matter, as Facebook has a large user base that could be content with intimate one-on-one video chat instead of Google+'s public Hangouts. In the run-up to the French presidential election, it recently created 30,000 suspicious accounts to combat the spread of fake news. Now it's taking on fake likes. In a blog post today, Facebook technical program manager Shabnam Shaik said the company is in the process of removing inauthentic likes believed to have come from spam operations in Bangladesh, Indonesia and Saudi Arabia. The likes are displayed on popular publishers' pages. How many likes? How many pages? Facebook didn't say it, but Shaik said, 99% of affected pages with more than 10,000 likes will see a drop of less than 3%. Read the full blog post here. [Photo: By Enoc vt via Wikimedia Commons] June 7, 2013 2:51 PM ET Order Reprints Print article Getty Images Facebook investors seem to have little concern about fake news, equity money or shareholder voting rights. That's the casual takeaway from the results of the votes at Facebook's annual meeting last week. But fine print makes it clear that there is one person in particular who is skeptical about investigating these issues: Mark Zuckerberg. Zuckerberg has a majority of Facebook's voting rights, despite owning only a 14% stake in the company. He owns 0.1% of the Class A shares that trade hands every day on the markets, but 77% of class B stocks that are usually owned by a small group of insiders. Those Class B shares have 10 times the voting rights of an A share, giving Zuckerberg 53% of the vote (and due to an agreement with another co-founder, Zuckerberg actually controls 60% of the votes). In fact, he may be able to hold on to his power even if he invests or gives away the majority of his shares. Zuckerberg has previously defended this structure by reminding shareholders that the smart long-term decisions he has made in the past: buying Instagram for $1 billion in 2012 and passing Yahoo's offer to buy Facebook for $1 billion in 2006, for example. If shareholders had voted, they might have gone the other way. In short, Mark knows best and shareholders should just be willing to go along for the ride. But Facebook has faced more than its profit power. And shareholders often care about more than just the bottom line. A recent successful shareholder campaign will force Exxon to test the impact of climate policy on its oil assets. Facebook has become a hugely powerful source of information, and it was blamed during the 2016 election for taking some steps to tamp false rumors spreading on its platform. After downplaying Facebook's role, Zuckerberg agreed to try some new ways to slow the spread of false information. Workplace practices, including decisions about hiring and promoting women and minorities, resonate throughout Silicon Valley and the rest of the country. Zuckerberg himself has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate, and his company has the control over the data of hundreds of millions of Americans. At the annual meeting, shareholders submitted proposals to force Facebook to disclose its political lobby, issue reports on how to combat online harassment and assess pay equity. They also tried to change the stock structure to reduce Zuckerberg's influence and ensure that the chairman of the board is independent. All these proposals have failed. There's one boss at Facebook, and he's not shrinking. Big Picture: Facebook's lack of shareholders affected grim display at the company's annual meeting this month. Facebook investors don't seem to care much about fake news, paying equity or shareholder voting rights. An error occurred, try again later. Thank you This article was sent to Facebook's day-two F8 keynote, Joaquin Quiñones Candela, one of the company's AI honchos, just provided an update on the technologies the company is developing to analyze video. The company is not only able to do it in a clip, but also what they do: sit, stand, walk, wave. It also works hard to push AI on the phone instead of relying on servers in the cloud. One project involves analyzing 2D video - most phones have only one lens on each side- and extrapolate 3D space from a flat image. That's useful for effects like real-time video selfies that make you look but pleasantly blur the background. Background.
